NEWS

The Euro recovers some ground against the US Dollar on Friday and is set to finish the week virtually flat as risk appetite deteriorates. This is taking place despite US President Donald Trump delaying a military intervention in the Israel–Iran conflict. At the time of writing, the EUR/USD trades at 1.1534, up 0.36%.

Gold trades flat near $3,369, on track for a weekly loss of nearly 1.90%.

Trump backs off immediate Iran action, boosting risk sentiment and denting safe-haven demand.

Fed officials split on rate outlook; Waller eyes July cut, Barkin stays cautious.

Gold price trades flat on Friday and is poised to end the week with a nearly 1.90% loss, after US President Donald Trump delayed taking military action against Iran, opting instead for a diplomatic solution. At the time of writing, XAU/USD trades at $3,369, down 0.11%.

Sentiment turned sour outside of geopolitical events, related to “US may revoke waivers for allies with semiconductor plants in China,” as Bloomberg reported. Trump’s decision on Iran boosted risk appetite, a headwind for Gold prices.

The GBP/JPY recovers and rallies for the second straight day, is up 0.43%, trades at 196.59, shy of reclaiming the 197.00, poised to finish the week with gains of over 0.40%. Market mood remains sour, but it was not an excuse for buyers to lift the cross-pair to fresh three-day highs.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average (DJIA) held steady on Friday, sticking to chart territory just above the 42,000 major price handle. US equities are increasingly pivoting toward Federal Reserve (Fed) rate cut expectations, and a series of key US data releases next week will draw increased investor attention.

WTI crude pulls back after topping $75.54 on Thursday, pressured by easing geopolitical risk.

Geneva talks between Iran and EU diplomats signal diplomatic momentum, cooling Strait of Hormuz fears.

Trump delays decision on direct US involvement, shifting market focus back to supply fundamentals.

West Texas Intermediate (WTI) Crude Oil is trading lower on Friday, slipping to around $73.80 per barrel after touching a high of $75.54 on Thursday.

The decline reflects reduced geopolitical risk following diplomatic talks between Iran and European powers in Geneva, which helped unwind the risk premium built on Middle East tensions.

Silver (XAG/USD) remains under pressure for a third day in a row on Friday, retreating further after US President Donald Trump announced he would hold off for two weeks before deciding whether the US should step into the escalating Iran–Israel standoff. This pause has eased some of the geopolitical risk premium that recently fueled safe-haven flows into precious metals, prompting traders to book profits and reassess positions as investors digest the shifting geopolitical landscape.

The Japanese Yen (JPY) remains under pressure against the US Dollar (USD) on Friday, extending its losing streak despite a subdued Greenback and shrugging off hotter-than-expected inflation figures that highlight persistent price pressures in Japan.

The USD/JPY pair is up around 0.35% on the day, trading near the 146.00 mark and testing a fresh three-week high at the time of writing. With Friday’s advance, the pair is on track to notch a weekly gain of roughly 1.20%, underpinned by steady US Treasury yields.

The Pound Sterling registers minimal losses during the North American session, after UK Retail Sales data disappointed investors, while the Greenback recovers some ground. Currently, the GBP/USD is trading at 1.3456, down 0.07%.

The AUD/USD pair ticks up to near 0.6490 during European trading hours on Friday. The Aussie pair oscillates inside the Thursday’s trading range, while investors await the decision from the United States (US) about whether it will directly involve in the week-long aerial war between Israel and Iran.

SIGNAL EXPERT GLOBAL

DATE – 23 JUNE 2025

CURRENCY ANALYSIS

EURUSD:

- Global trade tensions and the Middle East crisis are meant to retain the spotlight.
- Fed Chairman Jerome Powell is due to testify before Congress on Tuesday and Wednesday.
- EUR/USD aims to resume its long-term bullish run after a corrective slide from 2025 high.

The EUR/USD pair seesawed between gains and losses to end the week uneventfully at around 1.1500. Global trade tensions and the Middle East crisis kept the market sentiment on the downside, while the Federal Reserve (Fed) monetary policy announcement fell short of motivating investors.

From a technical point of view, the EUR/USD pair lost upward momentum but remains far from bearish. The weekly chart shows that the pair remained contained within its previous week's range, while technical indicators retreated from overbought readings. Indicators offer neutral-to-bearish slopes yet remain well above their midlines. At the same time, the pair is far above a bullish 20 Simple Moving Average (SMA) currently at around 1.1050. Finally, the 100 and 200 SMAs converge directionless in the 1.0830 area, reflecting the pause in the bullish run.

The daily chart shows the risk skews to the upside. Technical indicators aim higher within positive levels, while a bullish 20 SMA provides support at around 1.1435. Meanwhile, a bullish 100 SMA keeps advancing beyond a modestly positive 200 SMA. The latest downward move from the yearly peak at 1.1631 seems a corrective decline, with buyers getting ready to resume the bullish push.

Near-term support lies around 1.1470, ahead of the mentioned 20-day SMA at 1.1435. A bearish breakout exposes the mid-1.13, while a slide towards the 1.1300 threshold could attract buyers. Beyond 1.1560, EUR/USD could retest the year high, en route to the 1.1700 level.

CURRENCY ANALYSIS

GBPUSD:

- The Pound Sterling rebounded slightly after hitting monthly lows against the US Dollar.
  - GBP/USD looks to Powell's and Bailey's testimonies ahead of US PCE inflation data next week.
  - Technically, the daily RSI flips bullish as the Pound Sterling defends 50-day SMA support.
- The Pound Sterling (GBP) staged a late recovery against the US Dollar (USD) after the GBP/USD pair corrected sharply to monthly lows below 1.3400.

Having faced rejection above the 1.3600 threshold on several occasions, GBP/USD finally caved into the bearish pressures and corrected sharply, breaching strong support levels on its way to challenging the critical 50-day Simple Moving Average (SMA) support at 1.3398.

Heading into the weekend, the bullish potential is back in play as the GBP/USD pair defended the mentioned demand zone.

The 14-day Relative Strength Index (RSI) has recaptured the midline, currently near 52, justifying the renewed upswing.

On its road to recovery, the pair scaled the powerful support-turned-resistance at 1.3445, the April 28 high.

The next topside barrier is the 21-day SMA at 1.3521. A sustained break above that level will open the door for a re-test of 1.3600.

Further up, the monthly top of 1.3633 and the February 2022 high at 1.3643 will provide stiff resistance to buyers on the way to the 1.3700 round figure.

On the flip side, if the 21-day SMA acts as a tough nut to crack, Pound Sterling sellers will likely return to take on the 50-day SMA support of 1.3398 once again.

A sustained move below that level will trigger a fresh downtrend toward the 1.3260 static support.
